THE DISCIPLINE:
The discipline of communication disorders contains two related fields: speech-language pathology and audiology. The field of speech-language pathology is focused on helping individuals develop their communication abilities or regain lost communication skills through rehabilitation services. The field serves persons with speech and language disorders such as stuttering, articulation problems, aphasia, voice disorders, language delay, reading disorders, and other communication difficulties.

Students develop a knowledge base about speech and language development, the anatomy and physiology of the speech mechanism, the neurology of perception and production of speech and language, the disorders that cause speech and language problems, and the intervention and remediation strategies for treating communication disorders. Professionals often work in public schools, hospitals, private or community clinics, or private practice.

Audiology is a profession that focuses on the measurement of hearing and treatment of hearing impairment. Audiometry includes the study of the nervous system and how we process auditory information, the testing and analysis of disorders of the auditory system, and the use of hearing aids, cochlear implants, and other assistive listening devices to enhance hearing capabilities in individuals with hearing loss or other disorders of the auditory system. Audiologists typically work with hearing aid and cochlear implant manufacturers, in public schools, homes, research institutions, hospitals, private or community clinics, or in private practice.

CAREER OPPORTUNITIES:
This is a preprofessional program leading to a graduate degree that is required for entrance into the professions. Students graduating with a bachelor's degree in communication disorders may be able to find opportunities to work as speech-language pathology assistants or audiology assistants.
